I don't think that there is too much violence on television. The broadcasting and cable industry offer a wide variety of choices in programming. There are programs that appeal to adults, children, teens and every other demographic in this nation. Is there violence on television? The answer is yes. Is this violent programming targeted to children? No. Whose job is it to ultimately ensure that children don't watch violent programming?
Surely, it's not the broadcast and cable industry's responsibility. This responsibility falls to the family. A responsibility which has been made easier by the advent of technological products to assist parents in censoring the type of material that they deem inappropriate for their children. I think that passing regulations to limit/censor television programming, which predominantly targets adults, does nothing but impunge upon the rights of adults to choose what they would like to see.
